Gilbert Meilaender maintains "that if a possible treatment seems useless or quite burdensome for ligation to try it or continue it." Yet he later states, "it is hard to believe that we could withhold thholding the intention that the patient die." In clinical situations, I have been with many families t was useless, and did not have the direct intention of causing their loved one to die.

Neiswanger Institute for Bioethics and Public Policy Loyola University Chicago, Illinois

In an otherwise excellent article, Gilbert Meilaender makes an unconvincing distinction between respiratory and nutritional support. Withdrawing respiratory support is distinguished from intending the patient's death on the grounds that "one does not know for certain that a patient will be unable to breathe on his own." In normal practice, patients are "weaned" from a ventilator as their arterial blood chemistry is monitored; unfavorable results preclude further weaning. In certain patients with severe respiratory acidosis, it is morally certain that complete removal of respiratory support will cause coma and death. That such a patient may have spontaneous, but shallow and inadequate, respiration during this process would not seem to be morally significant.

Mechanical ventilation—with the painful blood-gas monitoring that it entails—is certainly burdensome, and withdrawal may be justified on these grounds. But this justification is not strengthened by feigning ignorance of the sure course of untreated acidotic respiratory failure.

wholehearted religious conversion to Christ as Lord among many Catholics. Anyone who has accepted Christ as Lord or Master of his life will not seek personal autonomy through individualistic ideologies.

Paul VI noted in Evangelii Nuntiandi that many Catholics are sacramentalized before they are evangelized. And, we could add, before they make any commitment to Christ. In the early Church, it was not so. Baptism followed a decision to accept Christ as risen Lord. His power over sin and death was experienced in the Holy Spirit. This is what is lacking in the Church today. I love to baptize babies, and yet I wonder sometimes how parents can promise to bring up their children in the practice of the faith when they don't practice it themselves. The same can be said for today, the Vatican Bank has no qualms about charging interest to those who obtain loans through its auspices. Perhaps Cardinal Pell could explain what is going on here.

And, according to the Catechism of the Catholic Church, "the seventh commandment forbids acts or enterprises that for any reason—selfish or ideological, commercial or totalitarian—lead to the enslavement of human beings, to their being bought, sold and exchanged like merchandise, in disregard for their personal dignity." This, of course, would have been news to the slaves who toiled for popes, saints, and religious orders. Did we invent the seventh commandment in the mid-twentieth century? Should an abolitionist have followed his or her conscience against the teaching, and actual pracmoral issues. My awareness of such inadequacies by its leaders and errors by particular teachers lies behind my enigmatic reference to "central moral teachings." For Catholics, however, "the most reliable authority is the Church." Moral teaching (and doctrinal teaching) develops organically. Thus it was on the very principles of the New Testament and of Christian moral tradition that abolitionists came to see, slowly, that slavery was morally wrong. They did not invent new principles here, but came slowly to understand what the moral teachings of the Church meant in this area of public life.

That Catholics of every era have failed to see or live up to all the implications of Church moral teaching does not mean that these teachings are wrong but just demonstrates the

Abstract: The writer discusses the 1997 Asian financial crisis in relation to structural transformations in the world economy. He contends that the Asian economies were not prepared for the shift away from traditional manufacturing industries to knowledge-based services rooted in information and communications technologies. He asserts that the crisis had underlying causes subtly connected to the ongoing economic transformation on two levels: opaque and inward-looking innovation networks and an unsuccessful shift by Asia Pacific to a changing world economy. Finally, he employs a plausibility probe to compare Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan, with innovation systems being the independent variable and economic performance the dependent.
